I am considering writing a paper in which I am claiming that those who agree with me, i.e. those I managed to convince of my point of view, are all wrong. In order to make a point, I would like to be able to say to them that they couldn't or shouldn't have believed them. What I would like to say, is what can I say, not what could I say. I have several places to get to with that. To my first question, what can I say that would convince the reader that I am right? Also, what I could I say that would annoy them. So far, I found it quite hard to say anything that is so bemusing or offending to the reader, that they would question their own view. Any ideas? Edit: To clarify, I want to say: It is not my goal to convince them that they are wrong, I want to convince them that they should be. Since I am not very good at convincing people, I wonder how I could do that in a nice way. A: I recommend that you think about whether you want to be persuasive, or merely confrontational. The former is an important difference, as it probably makes the right thing to do in your case. The point of persuasion (from Wharton's Personal Selling, chapter on "Persuasion") is "to change the listener's mind in a favorable direction by presenting him with strong reasons in support of that opinion." It is important to keep in mind that in this chapter, Wharton is talking about selling, so you need to understand the reason the viewpoint is favorable. In your case, you want the readers to be convinced that the view is wrong. So when you say it is wrong you need to provide a very, very strong reason. The point of confrontation is to have strong opinions, and then to share them so that people may become familiar with them. The typical example given is "Tommy's father always wants to make Tommy eat dung." You want to have an opinion about the issue. If you want confrontation, you need to share that opinion
